An Elopement That Causes a Sensation in Two Duluth Families.

Grand Forks Was the Gretna Green Where the Marriage Took Place.

About a week ago two young ladies sat in their room. One was tall and beautiful, the other of medium height, and rustic beauty. The soft glow of a shaded light filled the room, and the two fair intriguers chatted in a whisper. The taller of the two was in the house of her parents, while her companion was a visitor from Dakota.

"Will I do it?" impulsively asked the Duluth girl.

"I should. You will not be the first girl that ran away and got married, and do you know, I think it is so romantic and just too lovely for anything to run away with a lover. And then, too, when it gets in the paper it makes charming reading. I think all such marriage quite cute. You could come to our home in Dakota, and everything could take place. Then you could write home and tell them a L. 'Yes, do run away'."

Her companion did not speak, but a quiet smile played about her fair mouth. After a while she said: "Well, I love him, although ma doesn't. But ma can't understand that we love differently now from what they did in her time."

So it was finally planned that the wedding should take place at her friend's home in Grand Forks, and accordingly the two young girls prevailed upon the mother to allow her daughter to go on a visit. She did this without suspecting the plot these fair ones had in mind. The trip was made, and shortly afterward the young man asked his uncle, a dry goods dealer on Superior street, for whom he is working, permission to go to Chicago for a vacation. It was granted, but he landed in Grand Forks as soon as the express could take him there. Friday the girl wrote her mother telling her that she had married Joe. The uncle received a rush message from Joe as follows: "Send me funds to come home."

There is war all around to-day, and the young couple may be allowed to repent in leisure. Most of the hostility comes from the fact that Joe is a Hebrew and his wife a gentile of the Roman Catholic persuasion.
