The Spalding house telephone system is now nearly in full working order. There are nearly 200 house telephones and the switchboard is located back of the office counter. If it is desired to ascertain if a person is in a certain room, central calls the room, and if the guest wishes ice water or a cocktail he calls up the office on the telephone instead of pushing the button and calling a boy to receive the order. Guests who leave calls to be awakened at a certain hour have to get up and answer the telephone instead of lazily reaching out of bed and pushing the bell in answer.

A few weeks since, the pension bureau at Washington, in sending out a new code of directions to the pension agents in regard to the execution of vouchers, required that deputy clerks of the court in performing that service should sign the name of their principals, by themselves as deputies, and not as heretofore, sign merely as deputies. A good deal of extra labor was entailed at the agencies in consequence of this change and the bureau has rescinded the order, considering that there is no legal necessity for it.
