FEW pleasures have been given by Duluthians during the Lenten season just closed. It is only the meat man and grocers who are willing to testify to any particular self denial. The theaters have had just as generous patronage as at any time during the winter, and the hotels have lent themselves to just as many cozy luncheon and dinner parties. A number of ministers in the city said yesterday that from a point of self sacrifice this Lenten season has been the most grievous in their pastorate, while several women well know that at least one pastor has shed bitter tears over their persistent round of gayety. Yet they deceived none, not even themselves. If only eight people played cards three times a week, it was none the less social; it was just the same in total, as twenty-four once a week, and that is a fair sized entertainment.

After all, on this glorious Easter morning, with the sound of bird calls in one's ears, and the perfume of flowers all about, would it not have been more satisfying to have been really good, instead of only making believe?

Well, there is another Lent coming, and one can always profit by previous experiences. Perhaps it is not necessary to practice self denial; many people think it is not, but it gives an added zest to the splendor of a splendid Easter.
