

THE SOCIAL SIDE OF LIFE

WITH BANNERS FLYING.

Everywhere one stirred yesterday, there were banners flying. The banners will still be flying today, it is to be hoped, if there is no rain to spoil them, and perhaps tomorrow will see them still gaily fluttering.

But whether the banners flutter or not, whether or not the skies smile, perhaps the holiday spirit will still prevail. That is the beauty of the banners, anyway. They indicate that people are willing to forget their business, their cares, and their "grouches," however important or unimportant all these things may be, to have a good time.

There were some otherwise apparently sane men on the street yesterday with little flags in their hats and others held firmly in each hand. A sheepish grin stretched from ear to ear. The men's conduct was exemplary,—they were trying so hard to have a good time,—they were pretending to have even a better time than they were having.

It didn't look foolish, somehow, it looked just a little pitiful. The only cause for regret was that the men were not having quite as gorgous a time as they were pretending to have. But they were brave about it. The seed of the good time was there. It was planted in their minds. The theory must come before the practice, the thought before the realization.

Let's get in the way of having good times. Let's get in the way of having banners flying.
