White House Mistress Observes Usual Routine.

Mrs. Wilson, who has settled down to the usual routine of each successive mistress of the White House, is endeavoring also seemingly to give any leisure she may have to a brisk week-day day, observes the Washington Star. Her exercise ground is, like that of many another well-known Washington matron, the Potomac and its neighborhood, and her method is the same, motoring to the start of the race and off again up town in a White House limousine when her inclination or pedometer says "enough." Miss Bones is generally along with the President's wife on these morning jaunts, as well as on many others, and both most many they know. Only Mrs. Wilson's closest friends would think it proper etiquette to engage her in conversation, so that beyond an exchange of "good mornings" or more frequently just a bow and smile, her walk is uninterrupted.

Mrs. Wilson in carrying out the social duties of her position receives callers by appointment on certain afternoons each week. Sometimes her 5 o'clock at homes of this kind are large, and other times they are quite the reverse. She meets her guests in the red room, where some of the younger military aids make the presentations. A tea table, over which either Miss Wilson, Miss Bones or Miss Edith Tenham presides, is arranged in the window corner. Mrs. Wilson's taste for flowers is shown by a plentiful grouping of roses in the vases and blooming plants on the mantel.

With the regularity of the weekly entertainment and the fact that the President and his wife are often on the Mayflower for Saturday and Sunday, the latter leads quite as busy a life as any of her predecessors. She maintains, too, it must be remembered, her interest in the activities of church, charity, family and friends which formerly filled her life. The President lately has enjoyed going to the theaters in the afternoon with his wife, once to a musical and another time to a matinee, and it is said here, because of the many demands on his time, practically abandoned the long walks he formerly took through the city streets.
