DURING the last year women of Duluth have led rather strenuous lives, and now that their services are not so badly needed they are indulging themselves in a long deserved rest. They are too tired for the formal parties of other days, but are meeting in many delightful little informal get-togethers, reminiscent of the days before the war. The hostesses are loath to dignify these gatherings by the name of party, but the guests vouch for the fact that "they are heaps more fun."
